Consumer Opinion Is Mixed – What do they mean, exactly?

They (male and female characters) should interact in the way they are traditionally meant to interact, and neither should be disrespected or portrayed in a negative way. Men should be masculine; women should be feminine.

I think they need to leave men to being men and women to being women.

Advertisers should see men and women as partners/collaborators if both are in an ad. Men should not be seen 'mansplaining' and woman should not be dismissive of men's feeling and efforts.

Portray Men as Respectful, Capable, Emotionally Intelligent, Well-Rounded Individuals

A man can be vulnerable and still strong, and there isn't much of that being shown in ads or even TV shows for that matter.

I think some of the things that can be done, include not stereotyping men as being foolish, dumb, or irrational while contrasting with them women who are rational and intelligent; not downplaying or ignoring the fact that many men like the arts rather than sports; and also, in general, stop using the interactions between men and women to merely make men look self-deprecating.

Sometimes advertisers think they have to make men appear goofy or inept in order to make women seem strong; it's not necessary. Both individuals can be strong characters without diminishing the role of the other.

I think portraying a man as a reasonable caring person and at the same time letting them keep their masculinity is a much-needed message.
